

The weakening of the laws governing broadcast ownership in 1996 has already done a grave disservice to this country and the public interests. The internet, cable and satellite have created a need for stronger, more encompassing ownership rules, not weaker ones. Growth at the cost of diversity and content is careless and damaging to the industry - and, more importantly, to the country at large.